E&E Daily analyzed the positions of the 100 senators expected to debate the Lieberman-Warner climate bill. Projections are for either a vote on cloture to end debate, or on final passage. Positions outlined here are based on interviews with key senators, plus dozens of Democratic and Republican sources, industry and environmental groups. It also factors in Senate floor votes from 2003 and 2005, as well as cosponsors on other climate bills. E&E Daily will update this breakdown as the debate unfolds. (last updated 02/06/08)

How did E&E make its projections for the Senate swing votes on Lieberman-Warner? Here’s a brief rundown:

PROBABLY YES

Evan Bayh (Ind.): Potential vice presidential candidate, voted twice in favor of McCain-Lieberman on Senate floor. Still may push for help for home-state energy consumers.

Sherrod Brown (Ohio): A freshman with no voting record. Hasn’t co-sponsored any of the climate bills. Likely to seek help for Ohio manufacturers, with concerns about costs and international competition.

Blanche Lincoln (Ark.): Helped craft the cost-containment plan now in Lieberman-Warner, but still holds out. She says she wants to make sure auction revenue goes to low-income Americans.

John McCain (Ariz.): Has a long history on the issue co-sponsoring a cap-and-trade bill. Now, he’s the Republican presidential front-runner and wants greater incentives for nuclear power. A Senate floor vote in the heat of the general election campaign could force his hand.

Claire McCaskill (Mo.): Freshman wildcard, has shown independence from leadership. Unclear what she will seek as debate unfolds.

Jay Rockefeller (W.Va.): Long record supporting McCain-Lieberman twice on Senate floor, but home-state coal interests enough to keep him out of the top bracket.

Ken Salazar (Colo.): Given strong signals on climate. Still, home-state coal interests are strong and may push coal-to-liquid issues.

FENCE SITTERS

Lamar Alexander (Tenn.): Longtime supporter of carbon caps for power plants only. Now must weigh limits across the economy. Won a big victory in the EPW Committee by adding a low-carbon fuel standard.

Sam Brownback (Kan.): Flirted with climate legislation in the 1990s and carries strong interest in helping home-state farmers. Evangelical faith could also swing him toward mandatory caps.

Robert Byrd (W.Va.): Supported Sen. Bingaman’s 2005 Sense of Senate resolution, looking to erase his name’s ties to the 1997 Kyoto vote that halted U.S. participation in international talks. Always passionate about home-state coal interests.

Thad Cochran (Miss.): Cosponsored Biden-Lugar Sense of Senate resolution on international negotiations but silent on carbon caps. Voted against McCain-Lieberman twice. May be influenced by the politics of Hurricane Katrina.

Kent Conrad (N.D.): Carbon sequestration potential high for his home state. Rural co-ops, agriculture will be key concerns. Watch whether Sen. Max Baucus can have an influence.

Bob Corker (Tenn.): Said he’s leaning toward support but holds out on technology, economy and energy supplies. Traveled to Europe last spring for climate meetings with Sen. Bingaman.

Judd Gregg (N.H.): Voted for McCain-Lieberman twice and cosponsored Sen. Tom Carper’s power-plant only carbon limits. But GOP leadership, President Bush may have sway.

Mary Landrieu (La.): Gone back and forth on carbon caps. Supported Bingaman resolution, Sen. Carper’s power-plant only bill, cost containment provisions in Lieberman-Warner. But re-election campaign will be tight.

Carl Levin (Mich.): Voted against McCain-Lieberman twice but backed Bingaman resolution. Labor is key for him. UAW likes some provisions. Does he want more in an election year?

Mel Martinez (Fla.): Never supported carbon caps, but environmentalists have been targeting him because of home-state politics. Florida Gov. Charlie Crist (R) is out in front on the issue too.

PROBABLY NO

John Barrasso (Wyo.): Offered several constructive amendments during markup. Shown interest in climate issue but may not be willing to go so far.

Larry Craig (Idaho): Leaving Senate after this year? If so, is he thinking about legacy? Pushed nuclear issues during EPW markup.

Mike Crapo (Idaho): If Sen. Craig gets nuclear provisions, he could follow.

Charles Grassley (Iowa): Never voted for carbon caps but could get an earful from Finance Chairman Max Baucus and home-state farmers.

Johnny Isakson (Ga.): Made it clear during the EPW markup that he would be a player if his nuclear concerns were addressed.

Mitch McConnell (Ky.): Never voted for carbon caps. But he’s a likely focal point in debate as Republican minority leader up for re-election.

John Thune (S.D.): Never voted for carbon caps; has said little to signal otherwise. But home-state politics in play, as are agriculture issues. Also backed a bill that expands CO2 pipeline infrastructure.

Georgina Voinovich (Ohio): A major player in the climate debate with lots of concerns. Sure to be at table outlining GOP positions. Can’t be ruled out because of that.

Roger Wicker (Miss.): Newest member of Senate with no climate voting record. Could be influenced by Sen. Cochran, Katrina politics.
